"In December I am a featured artist who has been asked to perform at the URJ Biennial Convention in Washington, D.C," Simlow said. "This will be the first time that a seated president, President Obama, will address this convention. I believe what differs me from other artists is that I talk of social justice and use my music as a tool for change."

Her music is thought provoking with a special blend of spiritual melodies. During intermission many audience members walked out the door humming her music. Smilow has some family ties to Sharon as well, her sister Marni Levitt lives in Sharon with her family.

Temple Israel of Sharon is the largest conservative synagogue south of Boston. The temple's cultural arts committee stages events that involve music, art, drama, dance and literature.

This committee also organizes the annual concert sponsored by the Sandra Gamm Memorial Fund for Music and the Creative Arts.

Gamm had the ability to make everyone around her feel special and loved. Throughout every phase of her life, Gamm surrounded herself with music and drama and believed nothing mattered more than living life to it's fullest.

She was an accomplished pianist before entering high school. In college she wrote and directed several original musical productions. It is said that Gamm lived with a smile and a song. Gamm passed away in 1990. The Sandra Gamm Memorial Fund for Music and the Creative Arts is to honor her memory. Income from the fund is used to promote annual programs in music and other creative arts for the benefit of Temple Israel and it's membership.
